THE GREAT WORK OF ART .- Gott's copy, in marble, of the most celebrated statue of antiquity, "The Dying Gladiator," now in the Capitoline Museum at Rome, which is at this time on exhibition on 4; street, near Pennsylvania avenue, is the most remarkable specimen of the sculptor's beautiful art ever seen in America. The original has for centuries been the wonder of the world, the name of the artist of antiquity who chiseled it being Mr. Gott, sculptor, and I find it very correct comfortable night's rest to many, indeed, who

From the certificates of some of the most celebrated artists of modern times, which we have obtained permission to publish and herewith append, it will be perceived that the work now in Washington is an exact copy of the world-renowned great original. In itself. that is, in its execution, it far surpasses any piece of sculpture ever before brought over. Every muscle and tendon shown in extension, is as delicately executed, as the sublime work achieved by the artist in copying the expression of his subject, so long regarded as the ablimity of the divine art. Those who have not yet seen this statue, and have never been abroad, have indeed but a faint comprehension of the skill of the ancients in sculpture, of which the poets and historians have written so eloquently, as far back as the art of communicating thoughts by written language extends. It is out of our power to communicate to the reader even a slight idea of the leet of this work on the beholder. Our pen, we are free to confess, is inadequate to the task. It must be seen to be appreciated. Hilliard, an American traveller of rare taste and attainments, wrote of it some years ago.

"The last room into which the traveler passes contains several works of the highest excellence, and above all, the Dying Gladiator. A statue of such surpassing merit as this should have a room by itself, for in its presence it is difficult to look at any thing else. It is now admitted by the best authorities, that the statue is a dying Gaul and not a gladiator. but to the popular mind the old appellation will cling forever. Byron's immortal stanza -an exquisite creation of genius, equal to the | while delivering a lecture on the present con--an exquisite creation of genius, equal to the theme which inspired it—is alone enough to fasten it there with associations that can never the progress of the gospel—concluded his ad be severed. But there is no work of art respecting which such discussions are more intrusive or unnecessary. We do not ask whom it represents, because we are so wholly absorbed with what it is. Its power and pathos are independent of time, place and condition. What is it we see before us? A man dying; nothing more. It is that which happens to all men; the only inevitable fact in every life. Nor is it a marked or conspicuous person. He is not a hero, or a poet, or an orator. The form is not ideal, the head is not intellec tual, the lips are not refined. The shadows of great thoughts never darkened that common place brow, nor did the touch of beauty ever thrill along those coarse fibres. But the charm and power of the statue consist in the amazing truth with which the two great elestopped by the touch of death, and the "sensible, warm motion' becomes a "kneaded clod" before our eyes The artist gives us all the pathos and the tragedy of death, without its ghastliness and horror. The dying man is ne longer a trivial person, stained with coarse employments and vulgar associations, but an clay. The rags of life fall away from him. and he puts on the dignity and grandeur of that awful power, before whose icy sceptre all in Christ Jesus." mortal distinctions are levelled. "This statue is indissolubly associated with Eyron's immortal stanza, which, familiar as it relations of husband and father in which it is founded. From lines like these, which everybody reads and everybody remembers-especially when connected with objects of permanent and general interest-we learn how much we owe to the poets. Who, that has ever seen snow falling upon water, has not had a distinct pleasure in the sight, from the fine illustration of the brief duration of sensual pleasures, which Burns has drawn from this week at Odd-Fellows' Hall, Seventh street.

"Or, like the snow-fall in the river, A moment white-then lost forever."

Who, that has ever beheld a scarlet maple in our autumn woods, has not felt that a new which it suggested to Bryant? " But 'neath you crimson tree,

We may form some notion of our obligations, by imagining what would have been the emostatue. Would not something like the miracle of Pygmalion have taken place before his eyes? Would not the marble breast have appeared to heave with emotion, and the drooping brow, to be darkened with suffering?" Lord Byron, too, whose appreciation of the beautiful in art was equal to his taste and appreciation of the beauties of nature, it will be recollected, was inspired by it, as it were, to write-

He leans upon his hand-his manly brow Consents to death, but conquers agony, And his droop'd head sinks gradually low-And through his side the last drops-ebbing slow From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one, Like the first of a thunder-shower; and now The arena swims around him-he is gone, Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hail'd the wretch who won.

He heard it, but he heeded it not-his eyes Were with his heart, and that was far away: He reck'd not of the life he lost, nor prize; But where his rude hut by the Danube lay, There were his young barbarians all at play. There was their Dacian mother-he, their sire Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday-All this rush'd with his blood-shall he expire, And unrevenged? Arise! ye Goths, and glu: your Having seen a copy of the Dying Gladiator. made by Mr. Gott, I consider it a very faithful representation of the original at the Capitoline Museum. THOS. CRAWFORD, Sculptor. January 27, 1853.

Having been requested by Mr. Gott to give mine opinion about a copy of his representing the Dying Gladiator, from the Capitoline Museum, I have carefully examined his work and compared it with the cast taken from the original. In consequence of which I declare this copy to be a very correct and faithful one, entirely corresponding with the original and giving a just and complete idea of the cele-brated work of antiquity.
